Introduction

This special focus issue appears in conjunction with the completion of the first phase of the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies' Defence and Development in Southeast Asia Research Project which has, since 1985, carried out intensive studies in the areas of threat perception and defence expenditure, the military mind and development, and arms procurement patterns. It is encouraging to note that these research efforts have been very well received by both the world of academe and officialdom. One of the most satisfying aspects of the Project so far has been the emergence of a new scholarly interest in subjects related to the complex nature of security and defence planning in developing nations. The contributors to this issue are all members of the Institute and their work is a reflection of this new development in regional strategic studies in Southeast Asia.

Contemporary Southeast Asia is a journal that specializes in the politics, international relations and security-related issues of Southeast Asia and its wider geostrategic environment. Although it was originally conceived as a more general journal of the social sciences in 1979, CSEA has come to focus more closely on the concerns of the Institute’s Regional Strategic Studies Programme since 1987. Apart from serving as a reliable and up-to-date source of information on various events and trends in regional politics, international relations and security questions that affect Southeast Asia, CSEA also publishes the results of original research on these subjects by both scholars and other interested persons.

Contemporary Southeast Asia is published quarterly in June, September, December and March by the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies.
